Five Questions For Better Positioning of your Business
- Ask your team and yourself: What makes my organization uniquely valuable? Be honest. If you get many different answers or you have difficulty concisely articulating it, it's likely time to revisit your positioning.
- Identify the position that you believe your competition occupies in the market. Are they the largest? The most customer-focused? The thought leader? The cheapest? The most innovative? Their position will provide clarity in terms of where your organization is, or wishes to be.
- Should we conduct an internal SWOT analysis (in determining your strengths, weaknesses, opportunities and threats). If you haven’t done so in a while, there’s a good chance those have changed over time. They are definitely different right now.
- Ask your team and yourself: Is our organization structured for change? Are we trying to do too much? Do we find ourselves explaining, clarifying or justifying our product or service offering?
- Ask your clients: What is it that we do differently than our competitors (who are vying for your business)?
